The usual suspects are there ... Custom Brush, Content-Aware Fill, Liquify, Create Vector Mask ... As Lightroom and other photo apps have been adding layers on layers, taking things into 3D, etc., along the way, Adobe has engaged in those as well. Filters (non 3D) actually now show up in a separate utility window, accessible from the top of the menu bar. The filters are mostly a back-to-basics set of general filters. An ability to customize that is overdue. However, something has changed. When I point the Capture Tool (lens) to a single face in an image, it no longer displays a preview. The preview window no longer shows up when I point the Capture Tool to a selected area within an image. I need both, of course — preview when nothing is selected, and capture when I have selected something in the photo. The big news in Photoshop is the addition of the Photomerge feature, a totally revamped Photoshop Sketch, and a couple other Photoshop changes. Photoshop Sketch's capabilities are built into the native camera app on the iPad. However, we suppose one could plug the pen into any computer and use the built-in multitouch gestures to add and create. The workflow is so similar to one's Photoshop workflow, however, that it's just about seamless to use. The big news with the Canon camera app/lens, in fact, is that you can now sync images directly off your iPhone or iPad and the remaining catalog to the desktop version of the program directly through Wi-Fi. The only drawback is that if you're working on the iPad, you can only sync items that are rated 1+ because of the iOS restrictions. You can view a photo on your phone, tap to move it to your desktop version, and the photo will automatically show up on your desktop if it's a good image. Syncing lists is also much improved in this version. Syncing can be done directly from the camera app or from the personalized photo stream. The latter has been updated with the event tools and new filters, and my uni-lenses and uni-focal lengths are up-to-date. Syncs are far more reliable now as well. Many people have successfully synced dozens of images. Syncs from the camera app are also synced across platforms – iPhone, iPad, and desktop – and syncs from iCloud are often an option if not enabled by preference.

When it comes to color adjustment there are so many settings you need to adjust and you need to know where to find them. The first step is to go to where you would expect to find them (e.g. in the Color panel), but there is one other option besides the dropdown panel. For example in the below example, you can see the Hue Selector tool. This allows you to select the color of an area of your photo. Once you have a color you want to use it allows you to create a Custom Color Swatch that can then be applied to the color you selected and adjust it. Let's take a look at this image below. The image shows the Custom Color Swatch that was created from the Hue Selector tool. Notice how you can apply it to a different area of the image. In this case, you changed the color of the sky. When you apply the color adjust, you can see that the contrast of the sky has been changed. This color change can be done in very small increments to get the exact look you want. Therefore, without the tool I would have had to work in very tiny increments, trying to get that exact look. Now I can create my color adjustments in increments and keep looking at my changes as I see my changes before I finalize my image. The DVD-Video Enabler tool, along with its companion DVD-Video pack lets you create your own digital camera movie using existing footage, images, and sound effects that you can store on a DVD. As a creative user, this allows you to create your very own movie and include photo stills on a DVD and/or insert titles, chapter breaks, and your own watermark onto the video. 933d7f57e6
