As a result, if you try to open a folder that contains a compressed file after the name has been changed, you will be able to view the contents of the file, but not the original name of the file. The reason for this is that any programs that you run on the command prompt may have files open at the time and not see the command prompt when they are called. If you run a program from the DOS prompt, and the command prompt is currently open, the command prompt will close before the program is run. If you use the Windows 'Run' dialog box to open the program, the command prompt will not close. Another possibility is to use the %windir%\system32\cmd.exe command prompt command (on Windows 2000 and later, this is the version of the command prompt with the.com filename extension).
