The World Bank has warned that Nigeria's young population of over 110million people are already feeling the pinch of the country's underperformance in agriculture, which would be exacerbated by a severe and prolonged food price shock. In their analysis of the effect of food prices on the World Bank's poverty reduction agenda, the researchers note that Nigeria's annual GDP growth is currently just 2.2 percent, which means that it has failed to sustain the economic gains of the past decades. 'After a decade of economic growth averaging 4 percent and an unprecedented sharp drop in the price of oil and other commodities in 2014, the country is now in recession, says the World Bank in a report titled 'Grain, a recurring tragedy'. 'Nigeria's GDP growth in 2015 is projected to remain lower than one percent, with little prospect of changing the country's low agricultural growth
