The line art options are pretty much the same though the Live Paint tool is somewhat more powerful. If you're planning on using it, it's worth taking into consideration that it's a little more limited than the regular paint tool. The radial gradient tool is very welcome but the gradient style is a little limited at the moment. There's no provision for creating gradients with multiple colours, which might make some fine artists unhappy. They would have liked to have been able to select colours individually rather than having to use black and white. The radial gradients are based on a square shape and this means that they don't look as convincing as they could have done. In addition, the square is discontinuous and it's difficult to see if there are any gaps. It's easy to accidentally break the gradient in the process too. There are three formats available for the Pattern Stamp tool. Psd, Png and Web Patterns. This can be a blessing for some people who do a lot of image editing, but I find it really annoying because I remember what each of the formats is for. There's no format in between PSD and Web so the only way to use it is to convert the pattern to one of these three formats. The bottom of the screen shows your thumbnails so you can see what your image is doing. You can rotate it if you need to so you can see it from any angle. You can change the aspect ratio to suit your needs if you're using a large monitor or device, or if you just don't like it. It's also possible to adjust the work area size which is the maximum amount of pixels that can be involved in the image editing.
