DNG support has really gotten better and even if it isn't 100% spot on, it's pretty damn accurate. If I were forced to choose between this and Photoshop 12/13, I'd probably still choose this. I did test this out in the current version (2015.4). Unfortunately, for some reason, I couldn't import all of my RAW files from my internal hard drive. Every RAW that I exported was as an extended 80 on one camera and 142 on the other. Exporting normally retails at 144, and that was the only thing that was wrong. I'll have to test that out in Lightroom. That's something that I don't use as much, and it doesn't scale well in the older versions of Photoshop. This is what all software should strive to be. When you're using it to just view and organize your photos, the program does a great job. When you enable the cataloging, the minute resolution of photos is a joy to navigate. When you use it to edit photos, it does even better. When you are able to export a folder or image as a Photoshop Catalog document, it adds an extra layer of organization. (This is still nothing like a dedicated cataloging software such as Lightroom. A Catalog document is just an XML file that contains all of the information of a file.) Even when it is exporting to a.psd file, the program makes the file in such a way that you can even open the file in another program such as Photoshop itself. When a program does all of that, it makes for a great working experience. Photoshop has one of the best image editing and organizing programs, and can even export some of its functionality to the cloud. This is great for the Lightroom/Aperture users on the market for an alternative to work with there products directly.
