It is no longer by coincidence, but by design that Lightroom and Photoshop derive their name from each other. With the release of Lightroom, Adobe sought to expand its core desktop imaging products and made the decision to incorporate as much as possible from the other product into it. What they didn't do, however, was change Photoshop in any way. Rather, they chose to make Photoshop itself even better. Photoshop CS5 introduced new layers, curves and a completely new file format for working with RAW images. One of the features I was most glad to see was the Merge to HDR feature, allowing users to combine several photos to create a larger and better quality image. This is similar to the way that photos look on a fine-art print in galleries. Now you can add additional depth to your images by merging them into one, shared document. The new Merge to HDR feature is perfect for photographers and designers that want to create unique works of art from their own images. Lighting. If you are a fan of manual greyscale adjustments (if you like to play with the contrast and shadows) or automatic RGB or LAB color adjustments, you have access to both adjustments in Lightroom 5. With the Simple Lightroom Toolbar, you can access these tools as well as the in-app photoshop through the single toolbar button in the upper right of the final output window, and in the Photoshop Toolbox Panel, there is now a preview of the intensity, saturation, and hue of the selection, which you can change to fit your taste. You can view the Color Picker as well in the Photoshop Toolbox.
